

Project Management as a Managed Service: The Time Is Now

Why?

- Avoid the costs and delays of staffing new initiatives
- Get up to speed rapidly with an established, expert staff of project, program and portfolio managers
- Add agility to organizational responses to new opportunities or unexpected challenges
- Scalability – organizations can scale up or down depending on demand for resources
- Outsource training and other HR tasks for project staff

What's Involved?

- Assessment of the organization's needs and maturity / readiness
- Structured plan congruent with the organization's culture
- Integration with existing systems and resources
- Rapid onboarding of experienced personnel
- Professional oversight / management for optimum project and program results
- Opportunity to raise proficiency levels of internal staff through mentoring

All organizations can benefit from the value derived from good project management capabilities, but most organizations' core area of focus is not project management.

While some organizations improve capabilities of their internal project management team, others—including High-Performing Organizations, according to multiple PM Solutions Research studies—improve project management capabilities by hiring expert consultants; most organizations employ some mix of the two.

When the hiring, training, and management of program and project staff is outsourced to a specialized provider of services, project management becomes a Managed Service.

To learn more, contact Matt Crawford at mcrawford@pmsolutions.com.

